

Download How Does Cholesterol Affect Membrane Fluidity

Cholesterol is very important to the cell membrane and makes up about half of the cell membrane while constituting to about 20 percent of the total mass of the membrane. Cholesterol acts as a bidirectional regulator of membrane fluidity because at high temperatures, it stabilizes the membrane and raises its melting point, whereas at low temperatures it intercalates between the phospholipids and prevents them from clustering together and stiffening.